Abstract of Ph. D Thesis (September 1995-October 1999)

Title: Studies for selection of disease resistant line in sugarcane through cell and Tissue culture.

Red rot pathogen from susceptible (infected) sugarcane variety CoC 671 was isolated. The broth culture was used to extract the toxin from the pathogen. Modified host extract medium yielded more toxin. The toxin was extracted with methanol, diethyl ether as well as 5% sodium carbonate. Pathogenicity of the partially purified toxin was confirmed by bio-assay studies using cut canes, sugarcane leaves and various seed crops. The plant tissue culture methodology for callus initiation, callus subculture, cell suspension culture, shooting and rooting of the callus and hardening of the regenerated seedlings for transfer have been standardized for the variety CoC 671.

Different concentration of the partially purified toxin was incorporated into MS basal medium to check the limits of toxicity of the red rot toxin on callus, cells and regenerated seedlings. The cell lines were selected at higher concentration of toxin in the MS medium. The selected cell lines were subjected to the same concentration of toxin for several times. Then toxin tolerant cell lines were allowed for regeneration in the MS medium. Comparative study have been made to check the toxicity in the red rot resistant variety Co 740 and susceptible variety CoC 671, the toxin doesn't affect callus growth of the var. Co. 740 even at higher concentration, whereas in case of CoC 671, it inhibited callus growth at higher level of toxin. The month old seedlings were transferred to small pots for hardening. The toxin treated cells were analyzed for organic constituents, ¹⁴C-Glucose uptake studies and inorganic constituents.

RAPD marker assisted analysis was done in both resistant and parental variety
